Microsoft has repeatedly classified Office for Mac as a consumer product to justify the half-measure, even for the edition labeled Home and Business. Nor does Microsoft update and service Office for Mac for corporate customers as it does the far more popular Windows SKU (stock-keeping unit). At the time, Microsoft cited the long-standing policy of supporting a to-be-retired product for 2 years after the successor product is released when it added time to 2011. Recently, for example, Microsoft added a delivery-and-read receipt option to the Mac version of Outlook; that functionality has been in Outlook on Windows since 2013. Apple is expected to release High Sierra to customers in September Microsoft's advice about Office for Mac 2011 wasn't unexpected, since support for the application suite is slated to end Oct. The individual applications - Excel, PowerPoint, Outlook and Word - will continue to operate after support ends, but companies will be taking a risk, however small, that
